In this one episode TREK offers the exception to its own rule, deviating from its usual idealism, whether in tragedy or comedy - by an unrelenting realism of urgent perspective. Dion's 'Abraham, Martin and John' offers an ideal comparison for this episode, from pop music of the era, in terms of themes and context.

This latest entry, Savage Trade, is similar to his previous novel in a number of ways. For one thing, it is a sequel to an episode of The Original Series; in this case, the third season's "Savage Curtain." Additionally, it takes a species from Star Trek, also rock-based, and fleshes them out in an unexpected way. While the Excalbians are not nearly as interesting (to me) as the Horta, Daniel still manages to make them readable and a fascinating species.

The Savage Curtain - Wikipedia

The Enterprise arrives at an outpost on Zeta Gibraltar to find it completely deserted. Evidence points to the L'rah'hane, a group of pirates who once captured slaves for the Hradrian Empire, but who haven't been seen since the late 22nd century. The Enterprise tracks and defeats the L'rah'hane ships to recover their captives, but in addition to the Starfleet personnel, they discover what ...
